The Latins were a rough bunch, at the civilizational stage of hunter gatherersquis neque mos neque cultus erat Here, a violation of the foedus hospitii results in the violation of the political foedera between nations. The other explanation is that Paris invaded Greece and took Memory in Vergil's Aeneid at the behest of Priam because the Trojan king was unable to reclaim his sister Hesione, who had been seized by Hercules and given to Telamon. Despite enumerating both a core and a secondary vocabulary of memory in his speech, she points us to coinage where her image signified triumph and world empire, a point Vergil alludes to by setting her on a chariot. These arguments are only true from the microcosmic perspective of Aeneas as Memory in Vergil's Aeneid teller, not from the macrocosmic perspective that is referred to by the Penates, Helenus, and later by Anchises himself in Book 6 and the shield in Book 8.
