There may be some very good qualities in the materials but, for example, we may judge the listening material or the reading passages to be unsuitable and in need of modification. In other words, a grammatical structure can in principle perform a number of different communicative functions – an imperative might, for example, be a command or a suggestion, a conditional might be selected to threaten, to warn or alternatively to give advice.

However, it is also difficult to talk about technology or even computers in such a context. In this chapter, we firstly invite you to reflect upon your own use of technologies. In this section we have discussed the principle of the multi-syllabus, have shown how some coursebooks have highlighted lexical chunks as one particular area of design, and have commented on the task-based approach as an important area of development. Pearson Longman, We need to ascertain who the materials are targeted at, be it for development: life or death after pre-service training? English language—Study and teaching—Foreign speakers.
